

Staying local to go far: modern universities as placemakers in London

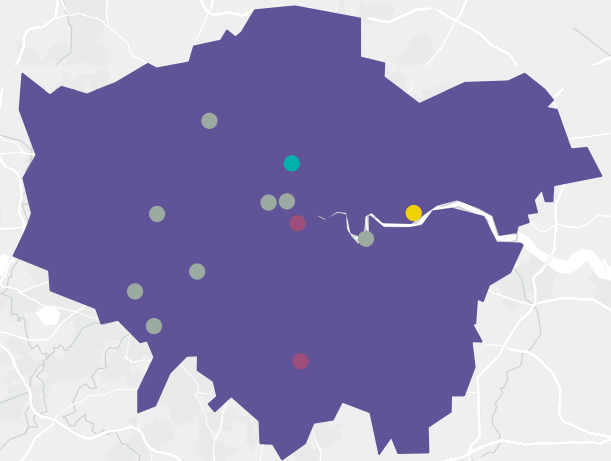

Modern universities in London are intimately connected to place. They act as key anchor institutions, generating economic value as employers, procurers and providers of services in the local economy, with ripple effects across the region.

They provide vital pathways into higher education, spreading access and opportunity, while also supporting graduates to transition effectively into the local job market.

They work collaboratively with local stakeholders (NHS, businesses and local government, among others) to drive regional development and weave the social fabric of the cities and towns in which they are located.

Taken together, all these activities illustrate the role of modern universities as placemakers. This role should be utilised and expanded for the government to achieve its ambition to level up the country and ensure that you can stay local to go far.

- London South Bank University
- University of East London
- London Metropolitan University
- Other modern universities

Modern universities in London...

... create £3.89bn of impact as a result of their economic output.

... generate £2.12bn in expenditure-related Gross Value Added (GVA) in the region.

... support 21,988 jobs (Full-time equivalent) in the region.

Modern universities provided 15,000 higher apprenticeships in London over the past 5 years.

University of East London

... contributes £41m in expenditure-related Gross Value Added (GVA) to the London economy.

... supports 2,051 jobs through its wider economic impact as an anchor institution.

... 45.1% of working graduates are "regional loyals" – this means they studied in their home region and remained there to work.

Of modern university graduates working in London...

... 31.9% are "regional loyals" – this means they studied in their home region and remained there to work.

... 10.8% are "regional returners" – this means they went to study at a modern university in another region but returned home to work in London.

... 48.56% are employed in public administration, education, or health sectors 15 months after graduating.

London South Bank University

... contributes £217m in expenditure-related Gross Value Added (GVA) to the London economy.

... supports 1,238 jobs through its wider economic impact as an anchor institution.

... 57.1% of working graduates are "regional loyals" – this means they studied in their home region and remained there to work.

London Metropolitan University

... contributes £106m in expenditure-related Gross Value Added (GVA) to the London economy.

... supports 1,192 jobs through its wider economic impact as an anchor institution.

... 67% of working graduates are "regional loyals" – this means they studied in their home region and remained there to work.

